Dear Nur Antoni, this is the first screening review's result to your article "Improving Language Feature Understanding of Story on Video Through Developing Moodle-Based E-Learning" as follow: Your topic is clear. Some ideas jump too quickly without smooth transitions. Some sentences are too long, shorten them for clarity.

Mostly academic, but sometimes too casual. Use precise terms instead of everyday phrases. Add more recent references (2020–2024) to strengthen the tone.

IMRaD structure is fine, but balance the sections. Abstract should include gap, aim, method, result, implication. Introduction should move from broad → gap → aim. Discussion should analyze results, not just repeat them.

You show Moodle works, but need to explain why it helps. Connect results to theories of digital learning or language teaching. Interpret results more, not just present numbers.

Generally clear, but sometimes repetitive. Replace casual words with academic connectors (e.g., so → therefore). Avoid repeating "Moodle-based e-learning" too often.

Your article Strengths: Clear topic, practical contribution, relevant to current issues.
Need to improve: Flow, analysis, academic style, and balance of sections.

Your article has passed the first screening stage. Immediately improve your article according to the reviewer's instructions above, immediately submit it back to our OJS journal system.

Dear Nur Antoni, ~~The~~ results of the reviewers' review of your article are as follows:

The abstract presents the purpose, method, and findings clearly, but it is too long, repetitive, and lacks smooth academic phrasing. It should be shortened and rewritten to emphasize the study's novelty, key results, and implications in a more concise way.

The introduction provides context (problems in school English learning, challenges at ~~Jovelin~~ Course) and justifies the need for e-learning. However, it mixes too many issues (motivation, teaching methods, word order, lack of facilities) without a clear flow. It would be stronger if you built a "funnel" — general problem → local case → need for solution → research aim. Some references are relevant, but adding recent studies (2020–2024) would make it fresher.

The R&D method, population (32 students), and instruments are well described. However, the text repeats itself in places (e.g., study period and participants). Simplifying and organizing the phases (planning, design, development) into a clear step-by-step format would make it easier to follow. Also, clarify how data validity was ensured and why Alessi & Trollip's model was chosen.

The results (Moodle platform, expert validation, student tests) are presented with supporting tables and figures. The ~~pretest-posttest~~ gain of 17.19% is a strong point. However, the discussion is too descriptive—it mostly restates results instead of interpreting them. You could strengthen this by connecting findings to learning theories (constructivism, multimodality, online engagement) and comparing them with past studies.

The conclusion summarizes findings clearly (validation results + improved learning). However, it repeats earlier results without giving broader implications. You should highlight the contribution of your study (how Moodle specifically helps with language feature learning, not just e-learning in general). Adding practical recommendations and limitations beyond "one institution" would make it stronger.

The Article Strengths: Clear focus, relevant to current needs (digital learning), well-documented R&D process, practical results.

Please correct it and immediately resubmit it in our OJS journal system.
